

Teaching is an Art for All Teachers

Mariana Oana Senda

University of Exeter

MA Ed. and Educational Leadership MA

Non-native speakers can be teachers too
Some people may doubt it, but this is true
One doesn't need to be born English to teach it
All the point is in skill and the passport won't breach it.
There are many factors to prove this point
Although someone may not want foreigners to get appointed
I believe teaching is an art, or even a gift of nature
One must develop this talent and go for an adventure.
A teacher can be effective and willing to learn
Although the passport will tell where he or she was born
A teacher can be helpful and willing to grow
One's lesson can be almost like a show.
Will it matter if a person was born in the UK?
Will the sky still be blue or will it become gray?
The talent is crucial, and the skill is essential
A non-native speaker can have even more potential.
So let us explore every point of question
A teacher is an art, and yet it is a profession
Being able to teach is a talent, and it must be developed
It can be given by nature, there's no need to spell it.

Being born a native speaker does not mean the skill is great

For example, think about your laziest classmate

Working hard to know all the rules is what truly matters

Non-native speakers may know the rules better.

Non-native speakers know best how to learn

It is something they definitely went through before

They know all the problems, all the tips, and even more

They can quickly explain all to non-English born.

Knowing how to learn English is crucial for the instructors

And non-native teachers may be like the conductors

They guide you and show the easiest way

They make sure that learners are feeling okay.

One more fact that is important to mention

And that should receive a lot of attention

Is that many studies have been conducted

To find out how English can be instructed

By people who started to learn it as teens

And never had English as the language of their genes.

The results may be strange, and still they are true

A person doesn't have to be a native to teach English to you

It can be easy to learn from a British

However, the learners may sometimes be skittish

Especially when they don't understand any words

And learning English feels like solving crosswords.

At the same time, a non-native can adjust

Knowing basic English is not always a must

To join the class of a non-native teacher
They usually know all the studying features.
There is one advantage when it comes to spoken lessons
British and American teachers have strong distinct accents.
Of course, they speak great, but it can be a problem
That learners will notice that there's no solving
The native speakers might be hard to understand
Their words sound nice but the learner's won't comprehend.
The last crucial thing to prove the main point
Is that people are different and they can be growing
The passport is not so important, the practice will show
Its only important how far the teacher can go.
Keeping in form all the time, and finding out new approaches
Organizing seminars and sharing knowledge with coaches
Being attentive and accurate, empathetic and kind
Will help any teacher develop learners' minds.